We are currently working on our next big project, which is our new book. We are very excited to share this with you soon.

In the meantime, we would like to invite you to our next event, which will be held on the 20th of March at 7 PM. This event will feature a panel discussion on the latest developments in the field of reconciliation. You can RSVP here: [link]

We would also like to remind you that ourprevious event waswell received and we have received a lot of positive feedback. We are looking forward to seeing you at our next event.

Thank you for your continued support. We appreciate your feedback and look forward to hearing from you soon.

Best regards,

[Your Name]
A Dream of Reconciliation

When we begin a gathering together for the first time, we invite to “Bird Central,” the airport in Israel, where we break down some of the initial obstacles and open the space for understanding.

Feeling overwhelmed and uncertain, we take to another location abroad. This space is a little wonderland beauty as a gift from God. We spent Friday relationship building, introductions, praise and prayer. I was blessed to personally witness and experience the power of this group. When we left on Sunday, there wasn’t a dry eye among us. We hope you remember the vibrant and dynamic group of young adult Israeli, Palestinian, and American participants in Bridge Builders experience. We hope you remember the reality of the other side.

The encounter was challenging in a way that was “out of the box.” Since part one of Bridge Builders, our group has tried to meet and talk about everything: the politics, religion, issues, the simple facts and continuous experimentation of the beliefs and identities which make us different. Our first Bridge Builders, that foundation was established and became solid ground upon which we can come from the common facts that we matter to each other, and we are seeking to find a framework, with a refreshing consistency and sense of direction. Following the end of March, during the Easter and Passover holidays, the group met in a mountainous region of Wadi Rum, Jordan for the second part of the Bridge Builders experience.

The initial half of the program in Jordan was the first time, we approached with new narratives and perspectives that were not ours, but those of others. After months of time to reflect on the subjects that were discussed in part one, we now brought the pieces together and to better know one another, the second half of the program sought to bring the group into deeper team, mainly the topic of identity and its effects to our lives, as we sometimes pass the aspects of our identity which differ from the other side.

We are seeking to reconcile. We may feel that we are not able to bring our story and our heard in order to create a reconciliation. These hold not their advantages, and by hearing and learning to each other through our similar beliefs, spiritual identity, and interests, we create a harmonious and other-worldly environment that we can construct and structure upon how to keep the trust, despite differences, come together in a harmonious environment.

The lesson was challenging in a way that was “out of the box.” Since part one of Bridge Builders, our group has tried to meet and talk about everything: the relationship, religion, issues, the simple facts and continuous experimentation of the beliefs and identities which make us different. Our first Bridge Builders, that foundation was established and became solid ground upon which we can come from the common facts that we matter to each other, and we are seeking to find a framework, with a refreshing consistency and sense of direction. Following the end of March, during the Easter and Passover holidays, the group met in a mountainous region of Wadi Rum, Jordan for the second part of the Bridge Builders experience.

The initial half of the program in Jordan was the first time, we approached with new narratives and perspectives that were not ours, but those of others. After months of time to reflect on the subjects that were discussed in part one, we now brought the pieces together and to better know one another, the second half of the program sought to bring the group into deeper team, mainly the topic of identity and its effects to our lives, as we sometimes pass the aspects of our identity which differ from the other side.

We are seeking to reconcile. We may feel that we are not able to bring our story and our heard in order to create a reconciliation. These hold not their advantages, and by hearing and learning to each other through our similar beliefs, spiritual identity, and interests, we create a harmonious and other-worldly environment that we can construct and structure upon how to keep the trust, despite differences, come together in a harmonious environment.

The lesson was challenging in a way that was “out of the box.” Since part one of Bridge Builders, our group has tried to meet and talk about everything: the relationship, religion, issues, the simple facts and continuous experimentation of the beliefs and identities which make us different. Our first Bridge Builders, that foundation was established and became solid ground upon which we can come from the common facts that we matter to each other, and we are seeking to find a framework, with a refreshing consistency and sense of direction. Following the end of March, during the Easter and Passover holidays, the group met in a mountainous region of Wadi Rum, Jordan for the second part of the Bridge Builders experience.

The initial half of the program in Jordan was the first time, we approached with new narratives and perspectives that were not ours, but those of others. After months of time to reflect on the subjects that were discussed in part one, we now brought the pieces together and to better know one another, the second half of the program sought to bring the group into deeper team, mainly the topic of identity and its effects to our lives, as we sometimes pass the aspects of our identity which differ from the other side.

We are seeking to reconcile. We may feel that we are not able to bring our story and our heard in order to create a reconciliation. These hold not their advantages, and by hearing and learning to each other through our similar beliefs, spiritual identity, and interests, we create a harmonious and other-worldly environment that we can construct and structure upon how to keep the trust, despite differences, come together in a harmonious environment.